

Credit union membership: 5 ways to appeal to a new generation

According to a report published in June 2020, 60 percent of credit union members' children chose to bank at a different financial institution. That's bad news for credit unions; it means they haven't yet attracted new, younger members to stay sustainable and relevant in the future.

We've created a short guide on steps credit unions can take to appeal to Millennials and Gen Zers. Read on to learn what credit unions should do to reach this potential member base.

- 1. Offer digital communications channels (social media messaging and video conferencing) so members don't have to come into the branch.
- 2. Provide self-service options such as a chatbot, knowledge base, or a well-designed IVR menu that automates processes to make it easier for members to find the information they need.

3. Make sure that members can still reach a human. Just because Millennials and Gen Zers prefer digital communications doesn't mean that human employees are obsolete. Sometimes, a human can handle a situation better than a robot can.
4. Give employees the tools they need to help members. When a member calls the credit union, they don't want to be transferred several times between reps. They want answers. Look for a financial services communications platform that offers an internal directory with a presence indicator so employees know which internal experts are available to solve problems.
5. Personalize the experience. With a financial services communications platform, you can set up a dedicated line for new members to get help with their account. Members will be transferred directly to a customer service representative who has access to their file, making the member experience faster and smoother.
